Unlike tales of fantasy, fantastic literature deals with what can be best defined as the impossible seeping into the possible, what Wallace Stevens calls black water breaking into reality. Fantastic literature never really explains everything, it thrives on surprise, on the unexpected logic that is born from its own rules.

Louise Doughty's last novel, Apple Tree Yard, was a heady mixture of secrets, betrayal, and complicity in violence in contemporary Britain. The same themes loom large in her eighth novel, Black Water, although in the very different context of the genocide in Indonesia in 1965 and the riots there in 1998.
